When a signal is emitted, its parameters go to all associated callbacks in sequence. That means, if first callback has destroyed a game object passed to it as a parameter, the next one will take a wrong pointer.

In the attached patch the parameters are stored in Lua state where tolua manages their freshness (or should do it) and just copied for each next call. It is tested on 3.1 but probably should go to all branches.